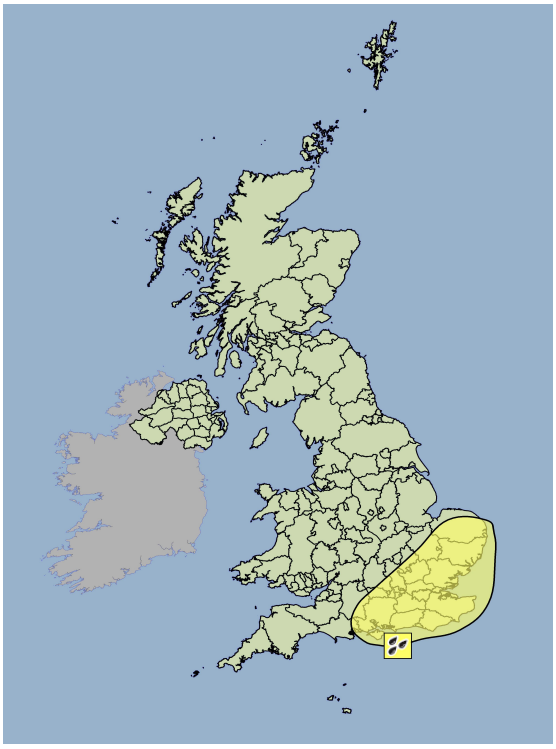
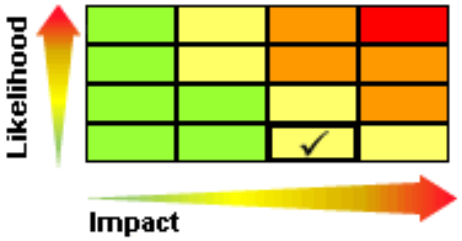
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A complex frontal system will run into southern Britain overnight, becoming slow-moving on Sunday. Warm, humid air on the southeast of this boundary is likely to become the focus for thundery activity, some of it imported from northern France, leading to localised torrential downpours.

As often in these situations, some places will miss the worst but a few places may see 35 to 50 mm of rain in total, with hourly totals very locally above 20 mm.

There are several complex components to the development, and so the warning is likely to be updated again on Sunday morning.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 22:00 on Sat, 29th Aug 2015 until 23:50 on Sun, 30th Aug 2015

Although not all areas will be affected, thundery showers or areas of heavy rain are likely to affect some southern and eastern parts of England late on Saturday evening and on Sunday. The main focus for thundery downpours looks limited to the southeast corner of England overnight but then becomes rather more widespread during Sunday afternoon and evening. Lightning may be an additional hazard.

The public should be aware of the risk of localised impacts from heavy rain and flooding, which may affect travel and some outdoor events.
